TOTALLY TRIFLING TRIVIA!

POLAR BEARS DON'T HIBERNATE

Bears in more temperate parts of the world hibernate to save energy during the lean winter months; they gorge on food during summer and early fall, then snuggle into a den until spring. You might expect polar bears to hunker down and try to snooze through the coldest stretch of the Arctic winter, too. But because their food sources — seals, fish, seabirds, and even whale carcasses — remain available all year, they have no need to hibernate. Winter is actually the best time for polar bears to grab a meal. The sea ice, which the bears use like a platform to move from place to place, reaches its greatest extent and thickness in that season, making hunting easier. Only pregnant female polar bears retire to dens for the purpose of giving birth and nursing cubs.
